What We Learned Along the Way Nadirah Angail

Malikah needs a husband—quick. That seems to be the only thing that'll satisfy her nagging mother. And it doesn't help that her younger sister married a handsome, young doctor, the most eligible bachelor in town if their mother is to be believed. Malikah isn't aiming so high. All she wants is someone nice. Maybe then she'll feel her life has some direction. Mariam has always had direction. It's a necessity where she comes from, the only way to rid herself of the poverty she inherited. So far, things are looking up. Her career is starting to takeoff, and she and Rashad will be married soon, but once his secret is exposed, will she continue to progress or become the type of woman she always swore she'd never be? Aliya isn't concerned about progress. She's a "live for today" kind of girl. Her mother died 4 years ago and she's been partying hard to numb the pain ever since. She has no plans, no regrets and no ambition, and that's exactly how she likes it—until she meets Langston. He changes things. Now all she has to do is decide if the changes are truly what she wants. Jaime knows what she wants, but can't get it, thanks to her overprotective parents. They're only trying to shield their 22-year-old from all the world's harm, but Jaime wants to live life on her own terms. Finally, she breaks free and finds herself in a situation she never thought she'd face. WHAT WE LEARNED ALONG THE WAY gives meaningful voice to the stories of young Muslim women, while maintaining a broad appeal that transcends religion. With no map to lead the way, these 4 friends take a journey into womanhood, and learn the life-changing lessons of love, heartache, redemption and identity.
