Maggie Day's crush has come back to Martinsville, and yet, he still hasn't noticed her. She'd thought it was a sign. Avery Steele moved back home just as she was getting dumped by her longtime boyfriend. His moving truck passed her with him in the cab right as Larry was telling her that he wanted to remain friends. She'd been crazy about him when she was in school, and seeing him now, all those silly feelings come back. What's a girl have to do to get his attention, though? Her matronly skirts and thick glasses aren't going to cut it. She has to step it up.

Avery Steele just watched the woman he thought he loved marry his brother and run off on their month-long honeymoon. His other brother, usually the man he is miserably single with, is on his own happy sabbatical. Alone and fighting the urge to sleep his way to a happier time, he can't see Maggie as anything other than a kid. She was four years younger than him in school and was one of his best friend's little sisters. He has too much on his plate to worry about hurting her feelings if she is the one he gets drunk with and takes to bed. It's best to avoid her, even if he finds her sexy as hell and all grown up.

Maggie had gone to a college over seven hundred miles away for a reason. At home, in Martinsville, she is Jay's little sister, or Kevin's baby girl. She can't be anything but the sweet and innocent deacon's daughter. No one knows she has a wild side, but she is about to bring it out if that's what it takes. She's waited long enough to get Avery's attention. It is time to get dirty. Wet T-shirt contests, mud wrestling competitions, and even a mechanical bull. Maggie is going to prove to Avery that she's not some little girl. She's a woman and she can make him one very happy man. She just never counted in her plans that Avery might already be in love with someone else.
